On the other hand, it was just the cold-bloodedness and tenacity of the English—amounting almost to a determination to prefer defensive to offensive action. What the British troops achieved even at the most critical moments when the regular army was being held in the attack, and the newly improvised formations had not yet been completed, was nothing to be remembered there. It is not to be forgotten in the big attacking movements had not grown to manhood on English soil, but came from the North American Continent. There were the doughty Canadian divisions.
